Government Contractors Circumvent Sunshine Laws

Government transparency strengthens democracy, promotes fiscal responsibility, checks corruption, and bolsters public confidence. Sunshine laws enshrine transparency into the fabric of government by guaranteeing citizens access to information regarding government expenditures and policies.

When government contractors assume control of public services, in many cases they are able to circumvent sunshine laws and shield important information from disclosure. Corporations may refuse to release records that would otherwise be available by claiming that transparency would hurt their bottom lines. Many times, contractors claim that the information is a “trade secret” or “proprietary” and legally protected from public review.

This brief provides case studies that illustrate how private contractors hide three key types of information:

1. The fees they charge the public,
2. How they spend public funds, and
3. Details on the quality of public services.

To protect the public’s right-to-information, decision makers should adopt strong sunshine laws that require government contractors to follow the same disclosure rules as government entities. As an additional protection, state and local governments should also include disclosure requirements in contracts.

Government Contractors Hide Their Fees

State contractors earn revenue by charging the government and the public for costs and fees to provide the service. Some contractors attempt to circumvent sunshine laws and hide these costs from public oversight, claiming that transparency would hurt their bottom lines and give competitors an unfair advantage. This opacity prevents the public from ensuring that contractors’ fees are not extortionate and follow the fee structure in the contract agreement.

When government agencies provide public services, the costs incurred by the taxpayer are public record. Not only must government bodies follow freedom of information rules, but the government’s main priority is providing quality services to the public — not earning profit margins — nullifying the incentive to keep costs hidden. In fact, governments have an incentive to disclose the costs of services as transparency allows the public, decision makers, and watchdog groups to identify areas to save money and improve service quality.

1 Connecticut: Maximus Inc. Refuses to Release Billing Rates for Managing Health Care Exchange Call Center

In February 2013, Access Health Connecticut — the state’s health care authority created under the Affordable Care Act — contracted with Maximus Inc. to operate the exchange’s call center.¹ The contract lasts three years and is worth $15 million according to Maximus.²

During the health care rollout, Connecticut’s NPR station, WNPR, submitted a public records request for Maximus’ contract with the state to uncover how much the company was planning to charge Access Health Connecticut per call minute. In response WNPR received a heavily-redacted version of the contract with details of Maximus’ costs blacked-out.³ (See Figure 1.) Without these details, the public could not ensure that Maximus' fees were reasonable for the service provided.

Maximus claimed that releasing the contract's pricing information could reveal proprietary trade secrets.⁴ The company's lawyer explained that "if... one of our competitors learned of how we priced... then they have an advantage that they have not earned."⁵ After WNPR filed a complaint with the Freedom of Information Commission, Access Health Connecticut released the unredacted version of the contract.⁶

Access Health Connecticut Releases Unredacted Contract after Freedom of Information Complaint⁹

2 Iowa: KKR & Co. Hides Fees Charged to the Public Employees' Retirement System

Public pension systems — government entities that manage retirements for public employees such as teachers and police officers — contract with financial firms to invest pensioners' funds. In exchange for a fee, these firms invest retirement accounts in mutual funds, buyouts, and other financial products. Today, public pensions constitute 28 percent of all outside investment received by private equity companies.¹⁰

In 2014, the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) expressed concern over the fees charged by buyout firms, prompting The Wall Street Journal to ask the Iowa Public Employees' Retirement System (IPERS) for information on the fees paid to private equity contractor KKR & Co. for a $70 million investment.¹¹

In response, the IPERS conferred with KKR and released a heavily-redacted document that provided little information on KKR's fees. (See Figure 2.) KKR's lawyer stated that disclosing the company's fees could cause "competitive harm." KKR also threatened the pension system by claiming that releasing the information would "jeopardize [the pension fund's] access to attractive investment opportunities."¹²

By withholding the information, KKR prevented the public from investigating whether the company's fees were reasonable and whether the company's charges followed the fee structure in the agreement. A later investigation by the SEC concluded that KKR had overcharged its clients and neglected to inform them of certain fees. KKR has since issued refunds to its investors.¹³

3 Louisiana: Carlyle Group Refuses to Disclose Charges to the Teachers Retirement System

In 2014, Carlyle Group and other buyout companies settled a lawsuit that alleged they colluded in lowering the value of the companies they purchased. To determine whether Carlyle's customers — including public pension systems in California, Illinois, Louisiana, Ohio, and Texas — would incur the costs of the settlement, The New York Times placed an open records request with the Teachers Retirement System of Louisiana (TRSL) for a copy of its partnership agreement with Carlyle.¹⁵

TRSL conferred with Carlyle and redacted most — if not all — of the content on 108 out of 141 pages before releasing the agreement. (See Figure 3.) According to Carlyle, disclosing details in the agreement “would cause substantial competitive harm” to the company.¹⁶

According to an analysis by The New York Times, which was able to obtain an unredacted version of the agreement, Carlyle was hiding an array of information, including details on how it passes legal costs onto pensions, how it calculates pensions' investment returns, and dates of the fiscal year.¹⁸

4 New York: United Water Utility Withholds Details of Multimillion Dollar Bill

In May 2014, the New York Public Service Commission (PSC) canceled plans to build a water treatment plant for Rockland County, northwest of New York City. United Water, the private company that provides water for Rockland, had already begun the project and attempted to charge residents for already-incurred costs — $56 million for planning and design and $4 million for interest.¹⁹

However, United Water did not explain how it accrued the $56 million in costs. The utility released the names of subcontracting companies, their hourly charge, and the number of hours billed, but withheld information on the services or good provided.²⁰ Without this information, the public and the PSC were unable to ensure that United Water was not overcharging residents.

United Water justified its opaque practices by claiming that transparency would harm revenues.

According to a company spokesperson, “release of specific financial or proprietary information could potentially harm the competitive position of the company, as well as its vendors.”²¹

In November 2014, the PSC ruled against United Water, blocking the utility from charging customers for the $60 million in alleged design costs. The PSC explained that United Water had withheld important information needed for an audit that could approve the surcharge.²²

5 Pennsylvania: Swarthmore Group Hides the Turnpike Commission’s Loan Repayment Rates

In 2013, the Pennsylvania Turnpike Commission contracted with Swarthmore Group, an investment firm in Philadelphia, to secure financing for new connector ramps between the Pennsylvania Turnpike and I-95.²³ Under the guidance of Swarthmore Group, wealthy lenders — at the time of this report’s print — were investing in a newly-created company called the Delaware Valley Regional Center (DVRC), which planned to loan $200 million to the Pennsylvania Turnpike Commission for the project.²⁴

At the behest of Swarthmore Group, the Turnpike Commission has not disclosed the costs of financing the project. By withholding these costs, Swarthmore Group has prevented the public and the news media from assessing whether the Turnpike Commission received favorable financing terms. For example, in response to an information request from The Philadelphia Inquirer, the Turnpike Commission released its loan agreement with DVRC, but withheld the repayment schedule. The Turnpike Commission explained that the repayment schedule was “trade secret and confidential proprietary information.” Swarthmore justified its secrecy by explaining, “we only hope to keep our financial innovation away from the cunning interest of our competitors.”²⁵

Government Contractors Hide How They Spend Public Funds

Contractors that receive taxpayer funds to manage government services may attempt to circumvent sunshine laws and prevent the public from overseeing how the funds are spent. While taxpayers might still have access to basic spending information that is held by the state — such as the total dollar value paid to the company — they lose access to public information that is held by the company. Without details on contractors’ expenditures — such as executives’ salaries and the services provided by subcontractors — the public cannot prevent irresponsible spending.

Whereas the public has access to details on how taxpayer funds are spent when the government manages the public service, once the funds enter corporate coffers, many companies claim that the spending decisions are proprietary and trade secrets.

1 Illinois: Bombardier Withholds Information on Manufacturing Chicago Railcars

In 2005, the Chicago Transit Authority (CTA) contracted with Bombardier to purchase new train cars with funds from the U.S. Department of Transportation (DOT) among other sources.²⁶ Federal requirements mandated that Bombardier follow the DOT’s Buy America rules, which require 60 percent of the railcar components be manufactured in the U.S.²⁷

In 2013, Jobs to Move America (JMA) — a national coalition that advocates for the creation of good American jobs in connection with the public purchase of buses and trains — requested Bombardier’s Buy America compliance audit along with other related documents from the CTA.²⁸ The audit was requested as part of JMA and the Political Economy Research Institute at the University of Massachusetts Amherst’s analysis of Buy America’s economic impacts.²⁹

In response, the CTA released a copy of the Buy America audit with text redacted that Bombardier had requested be confidential.³¹ (See Figure 4.) Bombardier defended its secrecy by claiming that transparency could hurt business. In Bombardier’s response to JMA’s request, Bombardier’s attorney claimed that “the disclosure of Bombardier’s trade secrets or confidential information can have an impact around the world where Bombardier does business.”³²

2 New York: National Heritage School Refuses to Explain How Charter School Spent State Funds

In 2012, the New York State Comptroller audited Brooklyn Excelsior Charter School operated by National Heritage Academies Inc. (NHA). The audit found that the school was failing to comply with its own by-laws, paying almost $800,000 above market value to rent the building from NHA, and compensating a board member $138,000, creating a conflict of interest.³⁵

Due to a lack of transparency, the auditors could not determine “the extent to which the $10 million of annual public funding benefited students” according to the audit. NHA staff refused to provide details on how the school spent $1.6 million, claiming that “the expenditures were private and proprietary.”³⁶ The auditors were able to determine that the unaccounted funds included $610,000 spent on “academic and general support” and $260,000 spent on “human resources,” but no further detail.³⁷ This opacity deprives state officials and parents of the tools needed to ensure that students receive a quality education and that the NHA spends funds on school programs, not corporate profit.

3 North Carolina: Roger Bacon Academy Refuses to Release Staff Salaries at Charter School

Roger Bacon Academy is a charter school management company that works in southeastern North Carolina.³⁸

In 2014, state officials

asked for the salary information of employees at the company’s Charter Day School. Roger Bacon Academy initially withheld the records, claiming that the salaries were private information, but without details on staff salaries, the parents and decision makers could not evaluate the management of public funds. When the State Board of Education placed Charter Day School on probation, the school surrendered the information to the regulators.³⁹

The Department of Public Instruction released the salary document to the public despite Charter Day School’s threat of litigation. In the salary document, Roger Bacon Academy included the line, “unauthorized release of this confidential information may result in incurring liability.” (See Figure 5.) The document also states that the salary information is “confidential,” “proprietary,” and a “trade secret.”⁴⁰

4 Ohio: White Hat Management Shields Charter School's Expenditures from Parent Oversight

White Hat Management is one of Ohio's largest charter school operators.⁴² When White Hat's schools began performing poorly, parents and board members asked the company to disclose how it spends public education funds. White Hat refused to open the schools' books, claiming that the funds were private, not public. However, by withholding the spending information, White Hat prevented parents and board members from providing guidance and oversight to improve the quality of the education.⁴³

The company likened the need for secrecy in its financial and education decisions to Coca-Cola's need for secrecy in its Coke formula. According to White Hat's attorney, "if I'm Coca-Cola, and you're a Coca-Cola distributor or a Coca-Cola purchaser, that doesn't entitle you to know the Coke formula or find any financial information you'd be interested in learning from the Coca-Cola company."⁴⁴

In 2011, a judge ordered White Hat to release the financial records for 10 charter schools in Ohio on grounds that the company was accountable to the school boards because it was a de facto public body. When White Hat appealed, a three-judge appellate court upheld the lower court's decision.⁴⁵ At the time of this report's print, the case was before the Ohio Supreme Court.⁴⁶

Government Contractors Hide Indicators of Service Quality

Private companies that receive government contracts may circumvent sunshine laws to prevent regulators and the public from assessing the quality and performance of public services. Without this transparency, the government and watchdog groups cannot ensure contracted services support the public's well-being.

Whereas the public has access to information on the performance of state-managed public services through open records laws, private companies that manage public services are able to withhold performance data. These companies claim that the performance records are trade secrets or proprietary, competitive information.

1 Florida: Corizon Correctional Healthcare Denies Public Information Request for Litigation History

In 2013, the Florida Department of Corrections (DOC) contracted with Corizon Correctional Healthcare to provide health care for inmates at 41 state correctional facilities.⁴⁷ Florida usually requires contractor companies to disclose the number, location, and outcomes of previous malpractice lawsuits. However, during the vetting process for Corizon, the Florida DOC did not ask the company for its litigation history.⁴⁸

When an investigative news agency — Broward Bulldog — requested the litigation history from Corizon, the company refused to release the documents, claiming that the information was a "trade secret."⁴⁹ By withholding the information, Corizon prevented Broward Bulldog from understanding the company's performance track record and assessing the quality of the company's health care services.

Once Broward Bulldog threatened to bring a lawsuit against Corizon for violating sunshine rules, the company released the records. By then, however, Corizon had already contracted with the state and was providing health care to inmates.⁵⁰

2 Florida: Trinity Industries Blocks the Release of Guardrail Safety Information

For the past several years, the Florida Department of Transportation (FDOT) has contracted with Trinity Industries, which manufactures industrial transportation products, to supply guardrails for state highways.

In 2005, Trinity changed the design of its guardrails, but failed to notify the Federal Highway Administration as required. Unfortunately, the new design jeopardized passenger safety. Instead of bending away from the car on impact, the rail now folded in half, allowing it to slice through the vehicle body.⁵¹ When the guardrail's design changes were exposed in 2012, transportation officials began linking the rails to fatal and injurious car accidents.⁵²

In February 2014, Safety Research and Strategies Incorporated (SRS), a consumer safety research firm, requested a set of documents and correspondences pertinent to the FDOT's contract with Trinity and the safety of the guardrails.⁵³ FDOT provided 13 files and explained that Trinity was reviewing more than 1,000 emails to redact confidential information before releasing them. According to the FDOT, Trinity had obtained a protective order that prevented the FDOT from releasing "trade secret" records. The protective order merely pertained to two specific documents, neither of which were requested by SRS.⁵⁴

Without information on the guardrails, SRS could not assess whether Trinity was negligent in injuries and deaths from car accidents on Florida highways. After waiting several months to receive the remaining documents, Safety Research and Strategies filed a lawsuit to compel the FDOT to release the information.⁵⁵

3 Texas: GEO Group and Physicians Network Association Withhold Documents on Inmate Health Care

In December 2008 and January 2009, poor health care services and substandard living conditions sparked inmate riots at Reeves County Detention Center (RCDC) in Texas.⁵⁶ The facility is managed by GEO Group, the second-largest private prison operator in the country, and the health care is managed by the Physicians Network Association, a for-profit company that provides medical services at correctional facilities.⁵⁷

To understand prisoners' grievances and uncover the low-quality health services that sparked the riots, the American Civil Liberties Union filed a public information request with Reeves County for documents on the provision of health care, prisoner complaints, and inmate deaths.⁵⁸ Reeves

County refused to disclose the information because GEO Group and Physicians Network Association claimed the documents were "trade secrets."⁵⁹ Once the Texas Attorney General ordered Reeves County to release the records pursuant to the Texas Public Information Act, the County filed a lawsuit to overturn the decision.⁶⁰

4 Vermont: Corrections Corporation of America Ignores Request for Lawsuit Payment Records

Vermont contracts with Corrections Corporation of America (CCA) — the largest prison-management company in America — to house 500 of the state's prisoners.⁶¹

In 2012, Prison Legal News (PLN), a monthly magazine that covers criminal justice issues, requested records from CCA on the damages awarded to Vermont prisoners from lawsuits against the company.⁶² When CCA did not respond, PLN appealed, and when CCA ignored the appeal, PLN filed a lawsuit to obtain the information.⁶³

By withholding the records, CCA attempted to prevent PLN from investigating and reporting on CCA's malfeasance and associated costs.⁶⁵ Without details on the conditions in the prison, activists and decision makers would lack the tools to build support to improve prisoner care.

CCA explained its decision to withhold the records by claiming that transparency would hurt the company's bottom line. According to CCA's public affairs manager, "CCA has proprietary information... and there is some of that business information we need to protect to maintain our competitive position and capabilities."⁶⁶

At trial, the court ruled that CCA is the functional equivalent of a public agency and must abide by Vermont's sunshine rules. CCA has since released the records.⁶⁷

Decision Makers Should Require Government Contractors to Follow Sunshine Rules

As these examples demonstrate, when government contractors assume control of public services, they are able to shield important information from disclosure. State and local decision makers should adopt a three-step strategy to ensure the public maintains access to information on contracted services.

1. Decision makers should extend sunshine laws to explicitly require government contractors to follow the same disclosure rules as government entities.
2. Decision makers should strengthen weak sunshine laws that allow companies to withhold public records by exploiting exemptions and loopholes.
3. Decision makers should include strong disclosure requirements in contracts.

With these policies, decision makers can protect the public's right-to-information. Sunshine laws that require government bodies to disclose details on public services strengthen democracy and improve Americans' well-being. Government contractors should abide by the same transparency standards.
